Facts

- Located on Buffalo's East Side away from downtown, the Central Terminal was a city unto itself when built, combining an office tower with transportation facilities.
- It was never the success that it was hoped to be. The Depression began soon after it opened, and it was busy only during the years of World War II.
- It has recently been left to decay. Its future is uncertain.
- The building was added to the National Register of Historic Places in 1984.
- The station saw its last passenger train on October 28, 1979. The last Conrail offices moved out in 1984, leaving the building abandoned.
- Central Terminal Restoration Corporation, which has owned the station since 1997, has been restoring the building as funds became available since 2004.
